

SOUTH AMERICA WINE TRIANGLE

Tasting the best wines and more
17 days / 16 nights

WINE, the elixir of Gods! One of the favourite drinks in the whole world. Wine is being produced in South America with a great success, specially in Argentina and Chile with renowned trademarks. And Bolivia, that has been producing wine for many years, is trying to spring into the international markets, specially with high-altitude wines and the Tannat variant.

In South America, Spanish conquerors had introduced vine cultivation into the heartland of the Inca Empire by the 1540s. Bartolomeu de Terrazas pioneered viticulture in the Cuzco area and later on Vineyards blossomed around Lima, Trujillo, and Arequipa. Francisco de Carabantes carried vines to Chile when he was sent by Pedro de Valdivia's expedition in 1548. The vineyard of Diego García de Cáceres produced the first Chilean sacramental wine in 1555. Francisco de Aguirre planted vines in the north near Copiapó, Chile, and his son-in-law, Juan Jufré, expanded cultivation and carried vines across the Andes to the Cuyo region of Argentina before 1570. Nowadays Argentina, South America's largest wine growing country is famous for Malbec, but they do much more than just that! Cabernet Sauvignon grows very well in the high-and-dry climate of Mendoza along with their champion white wine, Torrontes. Argentina's newer regions include Patagonia, which creates exceptional Pinot Noir. For now, the primary export market is Malbec, but their Cabernets easily compete with Napa.

Chile became the major wine producer for South America starting in the late 1600's after a major earthquake destroyed Peru's growing industry. The location of Chile's major wine region is typical for a cool climate. The valleys along the coast collect cool air as it travels up the Andes. Chile produces peppery and earthy Cabernet Sauvignon in a style very similar to Bordeaux. The country champion is a red variety called Carmenere, which has flavors similar to Cabernet Franc.

Bolivia's wine industry is based in the southern city of Tarija, near the southern border with Argentina. This region has long produced small amounts of artisanal wine. International grape varieties planted in Bolivia include Muscatel, Cabernet Sauvignon, Syrah, Merlot, Malbec, Tannat, Garnacha, Barbera, Sauvignon Blanc, Riesling, Franc Colombard and Chenin Blanc. This tour starts in Santiago, here you will visit its highlights. You will also join us to a wine tasting tour at the Casablanca Valley. Flying north to Calama, you will in contact with the Atacama Desert, the driest desert in the world. Spend a few days there, getting acclimatize to the high altitudes. Then, your adventure continues to Uyuni, the largest saltflats of the world on our way to Tarija and its vineyards. The journey continues to Mendoza and crossing the Andes, we will come back to Santiago, where your wine experience in South America will end. The town was a stopping place along that route before beginning the difficult climb to the Altiplano.
